ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

To Professor Baruch Levine of New York University for his good offices in recommending this scholar to Brill Academic Publishers for the preparation of a grammar of the Phoenician language I extend special thanks. To Patricia Radder, Desk Editor for the Ancient Near East and Asian Studies at Brill, sincerest thanks for her professionalism and patience in seeing this work through to publication. To my wife Karen, profoundly heartfelt acknowledgments: she was ever my support and active partner in bringing this book to fruition.

FOREWORD

The present grammar of the Phoenician-Punic has its origin in a systematic investigation and study of the language which I first undertook more than twenty years ago and have since then pursued in numerous specialized studies. From the start my purpose was to attempt a description of Phoenician and Punic based on an independent analysis of the language and its literature. Motivating my work was the perception that the description of Phoenician in existing grammars of the language was so exceedingly reliant upon the traditional descriptions of Classical Hebrew that the true character and genius of Phoenician had been seriously misrepresented and distorted. My work was also fed by the desire to seek out details of Phoenician grammar and lexicon not recorded in existing Phoenician grammars in order to “fill out the paradigm” with new, fuller and more precise information about all aspects of the language. Presented in this grammar is a comprehensive statement of the results of my work.

It will be immediately apparent to those who consult this grammar that it is fundamentally informed by my personal understanding of the individual texts of the Phoenician and Punic literary corpus and of the rich lexical treasure they contain. My understanding and translations of these texts are registered in my recent work Phoenician and Punic Dictionary, to be published in 2000 by Peeters in Leuven (Louvain). The reader may also wish to consult my preliminary sketches of the grammar of Phoenician presented in my reference encyclopedia articles Phoenician, pages 222-223 in the Anchor Bible Dictionary, vol. 4 K-N (Doubleday: New York, 1992), and in Phoenician/Punic in the forthcoming book The Encyclopedia of the World's Languages: Past and Present to be published in May, 2000, by the H.W. Wilson Press in New York.

The topics discussed in this work are necessarily selective. It is, needless to say, impossible within the confines of any modest work to cover in detail every feature of morphophonology and syntax. My object has been to provide good general coverage but, perhaps more important, (i) to present data and discussion not contained in other works and (ii) to present new and existing data accurately, based on my own researches in Phoenician and Punic grammar. Much of the new information presented in this work, invaluable for an understanding of the morphophonology of Phoenician and Punic, is drawn from the fully vocalized Latin-letter Punic and Neo-Punic preserved by Plautus in his play Poenulus, and from the late Neo-Punic in Latin-letters of the inscriptions of the hinterland of Roman Tripolitania. Although I have published studies in both, my larger monographs on this most important literature have not yet appeared. The reader will, however, find the substance of this work in the Phoenician and Punic Dictionary and in the pages of this grammar.

In one important respect this grammar differs from others. Rather than adhering to the traditional discrete bifurcation of Morphology and Syntax, this work includes the two within the same chapter, each chapter consisting of Part A Morphology and Part B Syntax and Usage. This in my considered opinion is a rather more “user-friendly” presentation of forms and usage, designed to achieve convenience of reference.

This grammar of Phoenician-Punic, as all scholarly works, has a long and noble ancestry in the rich scholarship of the past and present. For the convenience of the reader, I provide here a comprehensive bibliography of the existing major grammars and lexicons-glossaries of Phoenician-Punic.

REFERENCE SOURCES

The epigraphic passages cited in this grammar are, for the purpose of convenient reference, assigned the number of their source texts given in the standard collection Kanaanäische und aramäische Inschriften (abbreviated as KAI) by Herbert Donner and Wolfgang Röllig (Harassowitz: Wiesbaden, 1964). A numbered citation not preceded by a specified source reference is drawn from KAI. Other well known collections of texts are also used for convenience of reference, among them P. Magnanini's Le iscrizioni fenicie dell'Oriente (Rome, 1973), M.G. Guzzo Amadasi's Le iscrizioni fenicie e puniche delle Colonie in Occidente (Rome, 1967), G. Levi Della Vida and M.G. Amadasi Guzzo's Iscrizioni puniche della Tripolitania 1927-1967 (Rome, 1987) and J.M. Reynolds and J.B. Ward Perkins, The Inscriptions of Roman Tripolitania (Rome and London, 1952). Citations from other collections are preceded by the full or abbreviated name of that source. The reader need be alerted however that my readings and translations of passages drawn from these collections are not necessarily the same as those proposed by their authors or compilers. The specific linguistic origin or character of a given citation is indicated by the sigla preceding: Byb for Byblian Phoenician, Pu for Punic and NPu for Neo-Punic; a citation without specific designation is Phoenician.
